This paper presents a review of dental education, training, and service provision in the Republic of Ireland. The range of services that are provided within the Irish health system is illustrated. The underlying principles that govern these services are described. Key features of dental education in the Republic of Ireland are given, including the numbers of undergraduate and postgraduate students entering each year, and the ongoing provision of continuing education. The planning, coordination, and delivery of dental services are outlined and the need for a register of practicing dentists and dental professionals is described. The future course of dental education is considered, emphasizing the need to ensure that the dental curriculum in Ireland addresses contemporary public health issues.This invention relates to the field of wellbore geophysical production logging. More specifically, this invention relates to the field of such logging while drilling. Various forms of wellbore logging and wireline logging are performed to determine the presence and/or producibility of hydrocarbons. For example, it is desirable to know the porosity, saturation, permeability, the formation resistivity, and other formation parameters of a subsurface earth formation adjacent the wellbore, because these parameters can be used to determine whether hydrocarbons are present. Typically, the borehole is filled or packed with a particulate material such as sand or resin-coated sand (collectively referred to as xe2x80x9cgravelxe2x80x9d) to provide the desired electrical isolation for the measurements. Saturation measurements are more difficult in unconsolidated formations. The difficulty is compounded when hydrocarbons are present in the formation because the presence of the hydrocarbons renders unconsolidated formations electrically insulative. Conventional wellbore geophysical logging typically utilizes a source sonde and an array of receivers. The sonde may transmit into the formation an electromagnetic or acoustic wave which interacts with the formation such that some component of the wave travels faster than
