In this speech he explains why democracy and government deserve the same reverent respect as religion. Stop the flow of spirit and you halt the movement of truth. -Hermann Hesse, French author, philosopher and painter How we talk about things in our country profoundly affects the things themselves. We've taken the words of a former government official and planted them in the belly of an early twenty-first century blockbuster starring Will Smith, with a plot line written by Steven Spielberg. "America is the new global superpower," he says. "You were the only nation who let gay men marry each other. So we want to be as close to you as we can. You, gays, are in our very midst." "You, gays, are in our very midst" "Gays are to be seen, not heard," he says, hiding his sore spot with a rush of affection. "Only in America can God-loving men show their love as men." The film ends with the speaker taking a couple to a Christmas Day concert at a local church. It's a beautiful thing. The audience leaves the theater remembering their faith was strengthened by Hollywood's portrayal of a man's search for understanding. No wonder
