What's new in Boundel Soundtrack By James Thorley:

HD It seems like Greasy magazine is getting the best coverage of the video game industry. Most recently the site broke an interesting story that Nintendo Co., Ltd. had plans to bring back the Nintendo 64 Console and a couple of companies were on the look-out. The story said that Crunchy Frog founder Alex St. John had gone to visit Nintendo of America in Tustin, California to talk about possible late-2008 release of the N64. Crunchy Frog allowed the N64 to be marketed in Europe until 2004. Now ten years later it would be good to see the system back in stores. Hopefully with a price cut (the original N64 went for £60). Sony Finally Opening Up PlayStation Network The Sony PlayStation Network, which caused a riot amongst loyal PS2 gamers when it was first unveiled, is finally open for business. By now all users should be on the PlayStation Network - at least those who have signed up to the service. PSN allows users to play games online with friends, keep track of their games, upload screenshots, host online tournaments, check out online extensions and many other game-related functions. Through PlayStation Network comes the great thing that allowed me to host online tournaments of Pikmin over two days. So when I found an impressively detailed picture of the new game I took the plunge and sent over my pre-release code. To my surprise I received a high level code. Knowing the game would have the final TLC at launch, I jumped at the chance to play it against a larger pool of players. Mash Tactics Infinity started out with bad graphics, but I've come to accept them. It started to look good once I got into it and had complete control over what my units were doing. It had that feel of gameplay maturity that I can only expect to come through a well-designed sci-fi-themed turn-based strategy game. SunHack I'd like to start this by saying that I am very excited for PC gaming. In the past the likes of Linux and NeXtian's weren't given enough support to grow with the tidal wave of interest in PCs. But since the advent of cheap PC games, that's been changing. We've hit peak PC gaming now, with buggy and lacklustre consoles proving that there's still a market for PC games too. Being able to record gameplay, modify the controls and port the game to a

This game was inspired by the crop circles found all over the world. It is a puzzle-adventure game about a farmer trapped in corn mazes. This game is all about the mechanics and the mysteries of these crop circles. There are no monsters, no boss battles and no puzzle-to-be-solved. A true game for puzzle-adventure lovers. About the developer: This game was created by a fellow developer of a circle discovery game. The game was made for his own amusement but eventually found other players who are also interested in the game and that is when this project started. - GOODLUCK! MONSTER UNIVERSE Run through the darkest depths of the mysterious and dangerous depths of the sea. The deep, you must find out the answers of dark mysteries in the world that was closed off from us. Black skies, rusty iron, crumbling temples, dark forests, bloodthirsty horses. There is an ancient dream hidden in all these locations. Dive into the depths of the sea and find the answers of dark mysteries in MONSTER UNIVERSE. We love to play this kind of games. Because it gives us some reality still in this simulation. So we had the idea to make our own puzzle games, but different kind of puzzle that we wanted to play. And this is our first puzzle game. And we hope you like it.

Q: Why would you recommend wrapping up variables in an IIFE? I was looking at some code when I found `(function() { //variables }());` I don't really understand why you would want to do that. Is it just for reusability or is there something else you'd like to do?

A: One thing that you may want to consider (if you are not already doing so) is to abstract away any calls you make to an external library. For example, if you were writing a code using knockout and wanted to call it from one function while you were writing another function, you could do something like: `var self = this; self.model = ko.mapping.fromJSON(model);` And then further down you could do: `self.model.getItems();` A: IIFEs are used where code is shared between any number of scopes. The main two use cases are the following: Sharing code that is only needed for the next iteration.
