Subunit composition of the proteasomal substrate receptors: identification, properties, and regulation of ubiquitin receptor P97. We have isolated and studied a polypeptide of Mr 97,000 that is one of the subunits of the human ubiquitin receptor termed proteasome-associated transmembrane channel protein (P97), a protein of the transmembrane ATP transporter (TAP) family. Using antibodies directed against each of the P97 subunits we have identified the TAP-like 90-kDa, P97-like 51-kDa and Hsc70/Hsp70-like 80-kDa subunits. P97 is a dynamic protein that displays a distinct subcellular distribution: it is localized primarily to clathrin-coated pits and the TGN. We have investigated its involvement in the intracellular trafficking of the glycoproteins TAP and p97, as well as the role of its different subunits in the activation of the protein degradation pathway termed ubiquitin-proteasome system (UPS). Our data indicate that P97 is intimately involved in the intracellular sorting and sorting-dependent transport of p97 and TAP. When TAP was overexpressed in transfected HeLa cells, it was invariably targeted to the membrane by the P97-dependent cotrafficking pathway. These observations demonstrate that P97-transporting sorting signal in TAP contains a "class I" transmembrane domain that is recognized by P97.

Q: Open Source digital camera for java based application I'm kind of new to OOPs. I've been asked to develop a java application that would take a picture, analyze the pixels, tag them and then display the image. So what I'm looking for is a well integrated system where I can easily plug-in my code in the application. If it saves me some time, I would even be willing to not use my own camera but rather a digital camera that I don't have to integrate with my application. I know that there are OOPs based cameras like JVC GCV3, but that what I have in mind is something more like
