In order to sort out how the spatial organization of the brain gives rise to behavior, a basic goal of neurobiology is to understand how circuits formed by different cell types interact with one another to control behaviors. Developmental neurogenesis provides an especially important context for studying circuit formation, since it comprises a repeating iterative process of growth and patterning. We have recently shown that neurogenesis is not simply a passive consequence of development, but a critical component in establishing circuit properties. We propose to test this hypothesis by examining the development of neuro-circuits in the embryonic zebrafish hindbrain. The embryonic hindbrain is a particularly exciting system to study in this context, for it is subdivided into two anatomically and neurochemically distinct regions, an epithalamus and a rhombomere (r), which interact to establish a stereotypic spatial relationship with a proto- hindbrain that will ultimately develop into the adult spinal cord. The zebrafish hindbrain is one of the first systems to undergo neurogenesis during vertebrate development, and unlike other systems, it develops without a network of secondary structures, making it ideal for examining the emergence of neural circuits from first principles. The two rhombomeres in the hindbrain contain three different cell types, each of which expresses a different regional-specific chemoattractant, implying that cell-cell communication may be involved in establishing specific relationships between cells. Our research focuses on testing these chemotactic interactions, and determining how they translate into changes in connectivity. We will use two complementary approaches to understand the mechanisms by which developing hindbrain cells communicate and migrate to establish the correct circuit architectures. The first is to transplant isolated hindbrain cells into a defined chemoattractant free host-tissue environment, thus restoring the
