The work of structuralist theorist Pierre Bourdieu is particularly relevant as well, and he once described propaganda as a lie we tell ourselves. I first came across this quote while reading Bertolt Brecht's art critique, "The Threepenny Opera". One of the objects in the work described how greed, political ambition and psychosis are promoted as a means to power, while the alternative is presented as a meaningless life led in an artificial, duplicitous state. The emotional response to Brecht's work was immediately clear to me – I found it horrifying, and I've returned to the script several times since. It was Brecht's explicit analysis of the nature of power and the way it works that made it so disturbing. Later, I read a preface to the play written by the Swiss author, Christa Wolf, that contained the same idea – propaganda is a lie we tell ourselves. We tell ourselves lies because we don't understand what is happening, and we are vulnerable to the persuasive power of those who do

What's New in the?

A comparative study of patellar kinematics during gait by use of the Rutgers or Oxford knee systems in cadaveric knees. Nine fresh-frozen cadaveric knees were tested for anterior cruciate ligament and collateral ligament injury using the Rutgers or Oxford knee systems. Six were tested with the patellofemoral joint unhinged and the tibiofemoral joint fixed. The other three knees were tested with the patellofemoral joint locked in 15 degrees of flexion. Results indicated that the patellofemoral joint, when unhinged, does not move significantly in either flexion or extension. Both the Oxford and Rutgers systems were able to detect anterior cruciate ligament rupture with a 95 percent confidence limit and 13 degrees of error (SD = 19 degrees for the Oxford and 10 degrees for the Rutgers), and less than 5 percent (95 percent confidence limit) error in all cases. A single distal patellar fracture was detected by both systems at 15 degrees of flexion. The Oxford system was more likely than the Rutgers system to produce fracture forces at the patellar-trochlea interface. We found the patellofemoral joint to be relatively immobile, thus supporting the stance that patellofemoral joint fractures are relatively rare. We found that both the Rutgers and Oxford knee systems were able to detect anterior cruciate ligament rupture with a 95 percent confidence limit and 13 degrees of error (SD = 19 degrees for the Rutgers and 10 degrees for the Oxford) and were relatively free of systematic errors in most cases.'use strict'; var path = require('path') , util = require('util') , fs = require('fs') , existsSync = fs.existsSync || path.existsSync , join = path.join , resolveFrom = path.resolve , normalize = path.normalize , basedir = resolveFrom('basedir', '../') , files = resolveFrom('files', '../') , resolve = path.resolve; function makeGitIgnore() { return { // '/build' //
