The intravenous and oral pharmacokinetics of clindamycin after a single 300-mg dose and of vidarabine in combination with clindamycin were studied in 24 young healthy subjects. Plasma clindamycin half-life after intravenous administration was 3.3 +/- 0.1 h and decreased to 2.2 +/- 0.1 h when combined with oral clindamycin. The absorption of clindamycin was delayed and reduced when clindamycin was given orally. The oral bioavailability of clindamycin was reduced by 81% when given in combination with oral clindamycin, from 91.8 +/- 8.1% to 19.7 +/- 3.4%. Plasma clindamycin concentrations were below the MICs of the most common pathogens associated with beta-lactamase-producing bacteria usually sensitive to clindamycin. In contrast, tissue concentrations of clindamycin in the skin were 46-times higher than MIC50 and above the MIC90 90% of all pathogens associated with beta-lactamase-producing bacteria. Plasma concentrations of vidarabine after a single 30-mg/kg dose were 2.0 +/- 0.2 microgram/ml. Peak tissue concentrations of vidarabine were achieved between 30 and 60 min. Tissue concentrations of vidarabine in skin reached three times the MIC50 of the most common pathogens and were 43-times higher than vidarabine concentrations in blood. When oral clindamycin was combined with the intravenous infusion of vidarabine, the increase in concentrations of vidarabine in skin was less than in blood. The area under the curve
