In fact the surface of the earth will warm first at the Equator and then at both poles as the earth expands, the intervening land mass will stop further expansion and will start melting. The oceans will warm first at the edges and then at the surface. As winds in the upper atmosphere rise, the earth will cool so that the rate of warming will gradually slow. I think you have missed a couple of key points - one is that isentropic expansion is a slow process, and the other is that the absolute temperature of the atmosphere will not change much. From what I can tell by reading standard textbooks (I have not looked at the Rosen paper as yet) isentropic expansion is like a logarithmic function (exponent 1) so if one go from 100K to 300K the pressure decreases by a factor of about 10 (or  $\log_{10}(3)$ ). The latent heat of expansion should be the same as that of fusion, however, this is really not the case. The latent heat of fusion is independent of temperature (in the diamond equation, the heat liberated is given by Avogadro's constant) but the latent heat of expansion is proportional to temperature. I think you can tell a lot about a person from what they read. I read many papers in my free time and for me, they are easy to understand. I have never read a paper written by an author who did not make a lot of mistakes. Ars, Actually I have started thinking of the phase change from water to ice when I look at the graph. And I think it is natural for humans to give a natural process a name, and the best time to do so. "Actually I
